THE WORD

Sometimes the rules of life change. Habits that once made for a good single life do not necessarily make for a successful marriage. Time frittered carelessly must now be allotted with more thoughtfulness. Decisions must be forged rather than settled with a coin toss.

This is true of the wider world as well. Once society became industrialized, decisions made for an agricultural economy no longer applied. The dynamics of an industrial society in turn failed to accommodate a technological one. Whenever such a paradigm shift occurs, the rules must change because the old ones are no longer effective – and we must change our ways with them.

When Jesus discovers that His cousin John has been arrested and imprisoned, He proclaims that a major shift has taken place in what it means to be alive and human, and that what may have once worked no longer does. In other words, the rules have changed. “Repent,” He warns, “for the kingdom of heaven is at hand” (Matthew 4:17). The old ways no longer work.

War no longer works as a way of creating peace; it backfires and explodes in our faces. National isolationism that tempts us to wash our hands of world hunger or suffering; self-preservation finds itself giving way to self-sacrifice. This can be true as well of other institutions such as the Church. Women demand to be heard; laity seek to share in leadership; the weakest insist upon justice. The old ways no longer seem to work. It is a new day.
